America's Dilemma Religion and Politics series

This book presents a view of the operations of the labor market totally different from the conventional wisdom. The authors present data showing on one hand that jobs requiring a high level of education are increasing more slowly than those requiring somewhat fewer educational credentials. On the other hand, these jobs requiring less education are increasing faster than those requiring still less formal education. Additionally, Professors Pryor and Schaffer show how women are replacing men in jobs requiring higher levels of education. Using these insights the authors also explain why wages have become more unequal, why wages in those jobs requiring extra-high cognitive skills have risen and why all other wages have stagnated or fallen in the past quarter century.

Great Jobs for Environmental Studies Majors Hoover's

Unemployment is down, but so is job security. Careers can end suddenly and salaries can be drastically cut. How can workers moderate the effects of this fundamental change? This new analysis connects religious understandings of economic justice to the issues facing both workers and the broader community. The knowledge elites, Andolsen maintains, need to shorten the distance between themselves and the unskilled and poor in order to express solidarity for common concerns. The celebration of the Eucharist is used as a central motif for this solidarity. The New Job Contract digs beneath the buyouts and restructurings to unearth the deeper economic transition -- and reveal its implications for society and for families.
